Assignment: AI and the Future of Writing: A Position Paper

Description

This assignment is twofold: First, in active collaboration with AI, you will write a thesis-driven essay, approximately 1,200 words in length (excluding references), that establishes your position on a major concern related to AI and writing. The paper should incorporate at least five scholarly sources into the argument, though this is only a minimum. Be sure to use the APA documentation system for all in-text citations and end-of-text references. In addition to your sources, feel free to incorporate personal experience or other, credible sources into the paper as well. This paper must involve meaningful, sustained interaction with AI across multiple phases of your writing process.

Be sure to structure your essay (aka the Position Paper) as follows:

- An introduction that includes an effective rationale, overview, and thesis
- A body that advances considerable evidence in support of your thesis and both represents and refutes at least one oppositional claim
- A conclusion that restates the rationale, rearticulates your thesis, and offers a call to action
- A references page

Second, without the aid of AI, you will write a commentary on the experience of having composed the position paper with AI, detailing, among other things, the distribution of labor between you and AI, a general description of your iterative prompt activity with AI, your evaluation of the final draft, and how this experience challenged or affirmed your assumptions about writing and authorship. Draw on course readings and/or other sources where appropriate, citing them in accordance with APA. This commentary should be approximately 800 words in length (excluding references).

The position paper is worth 15 points, and the commentary is worth 15 points. Please keep them together in one file for peer review and final submission.

Due Date

The first draft of this assignment (both parts) is due Wednesday, April 8. Peer review is then due by Sunday, April 12. Your final draft of the assignment is due Wednesday, April 15.
